Forestalled

By JOHN G. LARNED

During the reign of Louis XIII, XIV. and XV. of France dueling was so prevalent that at one time it began to appear that all the highest men in France would be killed.

Paris in those days was a favorite resort for the few colonists of North America who ventured in across the Atlantic, and young Mathewson made quite a sojourn there.

One evening after a ball, at which Mathewson had paid marked attention to Miss de Boyer, he was addressed by a young army officer as follows:

The affair went on till Brayton took it into his head that he would go east. His affair with the ranch girl he regarded as a mistake, and the idea of breaking with her didn't trouble him at all.

"Great heavens," she exclaimed, "Suppose he doesn't know it's there!" The young man rode on as lightly.

Yvandeine now had two duels on his hands on successive mornings. This did not trouble him, for he was a year passed that he fought fewer than half a dozen.

Yvandeine was in a shooting gallery when he received the count's withdrawal. He endeavored to discover the reason for the withdrawal.

The Girl With the Lariat

By DWIGHT NORWOOD

When Lory Brayton was graduated from college, having means, he thought he would like to go west and become a rancher.

For awhile riding over his broad acres and doing a little horse-raising kept him contented. But it wasn't long before he began to pine for something more exciting.

It is not an easy matter to separate the names of The Daily Intelligencer from semi-weekly subscribers, the continued fitness of the business manager of this paper being quite a drawback to us, and we therefore assure any of our readers who subscribed for the semi-weekly and happen to get the daily that they will not have to pay for the daily. Take it and read it with us until we can get the swag-bagged out, which will be in a few days.
